Help Senior Parents Manage Their Money

Adult children caring for senior parents are attending to more than medical needs--they are assisting with money management tasks and financial decision making. Consider these tips:

- 1. Start the money conversation. Does the parent need help with bill paying or balancing a checkbook? Who will manage funds if your parents cannot? Approach the subject by saying you heard that a friend had a similar money discussion with her parents and everyone agreed it resulted in significant peace of mind.
- 2. Ask about legal documents. Request that your parents designate someone to manage financial affairs, health-care power of attorney, living will, and will. Make sure you understand your parents' wishes.
- 3. Understand basic information. Review monthly income sources and expenses. If expenses exceed income from Social Security and pensions, where will supplemental funds come from? Prepare a balance sheet listing assets and debts, and get a list of your parents' financial advisers.
- 4. Reduce parental debt. Make a plan to pay off accounts with high interest rates, transfer balances to accounts with lower interest rates, and stop using credit to pay for monthly needs. Consider a reverse mortgage as another source of income.
- 5. Review insurance coverage. Review all contracts; benefit limits may be outdated. Consider increasing deductibles or limiting coverage if funds are available to cover small losses.
- 6. Hire assistance. Parents may need help preparing taxes, managing investments, and choosing housing options. Consider someone who specializes in geriatric finance. Be sure a financial adviser holds appropriate credentials such as certified public accountant, or licenses for insurance and brokerage services.

Everyone no matter what age can benefit from these tips.
